It has become clear in recent years that new and specifically tailored antibiotics are needed to combat the increasing numbers of pathogenic bacteria. The enormous structural diversity of natural products is reflected in the elaborate synthetic programs being undertaken to build on a foundation of microbial screening and structure elucidation. In the search for antibiotics, the biosynthetic genes of several novel classes of natural products have been identified and characterized. Among the classes are the nonribosomal peptides such as dipeptide and peptide antibiotics. However, antibiotic development of this class has been slow since it is complicated and time consuming to manipulate gene clusters to obtain novel compounds. Diacylglycerol (DAG) is a low molecular weight glycerol ester that is involved in the metabolism of the membrane phospholipids. The carbon backbone of the DAG molecule is hydrophobic, and DAG serves as a repository for membrane lipid components and is also a component of coenzyme A and coenzyme Q. DAG biosynthesis begins in the endoplasmic reticulum where the reduction of a 6-carbon fatty acyl
