I have written a paper in the past, and I want to know if there is any set of guidelines which would make my work more organized and easy to understand. So, I want to know is there a way I can split a thesis into multiple smaller articles, so that I can keep track of what I have already written and what's to be written. A: I think this question implies that the issue is in the writing. I suggest collecting related ideas in section or subsections, but link out with a general heading for the rest of the page. This allows the reader to ask themselves "so, what is this?" as they read along. I would use the same process as "Project Planning: Metadata" for the PhD, outlined in the article "Project Planning: Metadata". to let me know. BTW:If any of you are now working in the oil fields, or want to know what the employment scene is like, I can tell you that there are a LOT of jobs in a field, you find one and you get a good ride on the truck and you see the whole place and you get paid on time and after that you have a friend for life. It is not a glamorized job. But you can get away with killing yourself. You can get away with killing yourself on that slick road and never see another living soul for a long, long time. As for the
