Moving 360 or you're out? In FIFA, your goal is simple: Score goals. Or at least, score more goals than your opponent. Now, all 14 clubs' attacks will track players' runs, sprints and complete movements, so that opponents can see exactly what to expect if you take a quick line-breaking run to set up an aerial duel, for example. They'll also see you moving and decide whether to push forward or kick high, change the angle of their pass or move diagonally from the touchline. To give an example, in FIFA 19, a striker like Lionel Messi might run a quick couple of strides toward the penalty area, but then change direction, a lot, to counterpunch once the opposition has anticipated his attacking run. A defender like Jadon Sancho might sprint for the halfway line, then change direction as he clears the ball. The goalkeeper would simply move back, out of the danger zone. With the new tracking technology in Fifa 22 Product Key, your player movement will be more varied and unpredictable. [FIFA 20: Inside EA's New, Better, More Realistic FIFA 22 - what you should expect in this year's iteration of the franchise] How does it work? Unlike previous FIFA versions, FIFA 22 will track and record the movements of all 22 real-life players that take part in a complete high-intensity football match. Using data from a match recorded from the players' movements, tackles and tackles, the ball will be simulated as a living ball (this means it will keep its shape, move as the player moves and rotate like the ball would in a real match). This allows for more realistic ball flight and movement. However, for more nuance, each team will have their very own unique play-style, and all players' moves will be based on how they play in-game, with specific attacks, heading and dribbling styles. For example, goalkeepers will move differently, be far more agile, and make more saves than the top class players, who have more armour and are slow and heavy. So a goalkeeper like Gianluigi Buffon might sprint through more space and stop shots more quickly than an outfield player like Steven Gerrard. [PHOTOS: New FIFA 22
