Enjoy.Effect of a weak electric field on the mechanism of charge separation in photosystem II. We carried out simulations of the electron transfer and the driving force for the charge separation in the photosystem II (PSII) reaction center. We used the QM/MM method where the full protein complex was placed in a uniform dielectric environment and an external electric field was applied to the protein. The field strength was 0.5-1.0 MVm(-1) which is about 200-300 times weaker than the typical fields used to reveal the LHCII absorption spectra and the photocarrier dynamics of the photosynthetic complex. The light-induced evolution of the electron transfer and cofactor Q(A) oxidation processes were studied with the aim of determining their dependence on the field strength. We revealed a visible increase in the electron transfer process efficiency with increasing field intensity. We found out that the field-induced acceleration of the electron transfer from the primary electron acceptor P680(+)-Q(A)(-) to the back electron transfer cofactor Q(B), that are due to their separate effective potentials, has an approximately linear relationship with the field strength. On the contrary, the field-induced processes associated with the effective potential of the main donor side cofactor Q(B) show nonlinear dependencies on the field strength. The field-induced effects in the
