under the coalition's national broadband network (nbn) policy, internet providers are required to ensure that "up to 50 per cent of premises" in australia are available for download speeds of 25 megabits per second (mbps) or more. the two states have indicated that they will not appeal the decision to the high court, and will instead continue to work with the federal government to implement the policy as recommended by the joint standing committee on the national broadband network. the coalition's policy is expected to be published within the next few weeks, and will be a hybrid of fibre to the node, fibre to the premises and hybrid fibre coaxial (hfc) technologies, with the potential for a coalition government to extend the policy to other states if a federal government is formed. erik osterloh is the lead developer of the popular virtual machine software, virtualbox. today he's going to show us how to build an installer for a project he's working on. the software in question is kickass torrents, which is a torrent indexing site similar to the pirate bay. it has been downloaded more than 9.5 million times, making it one of the most popular bittorrent sites on the internet. the problem erik's working on is how to bundle the latest version of kickass torrents with virtualbox so that people can install kickass torrents on their machines. the way he solves this problem is to package the installer in a format called a "changelog". a changelog is a list of changes that have been made in a release, and can be readily installed on a newer version of the software.
