A multicenter study]. The main objectives of the study were to evaluate the stability of cheese flavor in the medium term and to check if the results obtained through sensory test were useful to select the best cimento cheese. A total of six cheeses made from raw milk were studied and to assess their sensory characteristics were used a panel of 60 students from five classes of the University of Padova. Students were requested to complete a questionnaire for each cheese and record the sensory properties that they perceived: intensity, duration, and depth. A pilot study showed that cheese flavor is more difficult to evaluate than other dairy products; however, the results of the sensory test were not very different from those of other studies. The main criteria used for grading the sensory properties of the cheeses was the intensity, as for all cheeses a score from 1 to 5 was assigned for the intensity of the tastes. The mean values and standard deviations were 3.65 +/- 0.41 for cimento cheese, 3.62 +/- 0.30 for fior di latte cheese, 3.12 +/- 0.33 for stracchino cheese, 2.99 +/- 0.22 for Bufala and 2.54 +/- 0.09 for Montasio cheese. The differences were significant (p
