While Adobe has updated and fixed many issues in the short while since Lightroom 5's release, they're still improving the other side of the story. Their promises of taking away the free upgrades as Lightroom CC is being used, or simply making your files IP protected, flatters both sides. And this can be overrated to an extent. After all, both the iPhone and the iPad Pro have a substantial number of flaws. The first results are good, but there are more additional steps necessary to bring something new to a good result. The previous experience with Lightroom was very comforting when editing and, especially, exporting images, because there were so many steps to perform and so many pitfalls. The bulk of the app's interface remains unchanged, with the main toolbar along the top and a series of tools at the bottom. I'd argue that this is the closest you'll ever get to the iOS app experience, but it's still a ton of work to find, organize, and sort through all your options. Adobe's interface choices also seem like a return to their software's roots. You can switch to the Classic interface by clicking the icon at the bottom of the app's main window (or by navigating to Window|Resources|User Interface>Select the classic interface option). The interface feels a little bit like the classic version of Photoshop, and it makes sense that Adobe is giving users that option once more. Indeed, the Classic tools are similarly organized, with the same huge toolbox along the bottom.

Photos are one of the most fundamental elements in the design world. The software can be used to edit photographs and to create new ones as well. You can also use it to set images aside in a virtual assortment box. You can also use it to crop the photos to get rid of an unwanted portion of it. In addition, the software can be used to align images. You can also do digital photo printing for example. You can also share the photos with your family and friends on Facebook and other social media websites. Adobe Sensei AI has been built with AI accelerators and a machine learning engine to process images in real time. That means no lag, responsiveness to movement and changes, and the ability to identify objects and make collaborative edits, all powered by machine learning technology and powered by the web. Share for Review enables Photoshop to be used as an always-on collaborative workspace, one that replicates real project collaboration features—allowing easy, efficient, non-distracting and secure access to Photoshop, working documents and image files. Users can interact with coworkers on the web to add, rotate and resize objects, draw with markers, or create annotations and notes in collaboration, all without leaving the application. Share for Review appears when a user remotely clicks the top right button on their monitor, or opens an external session url while in Photoshop. This feature is optional and available only on supported macOS versions. Additionally, Share for Review in Photoshop is compatible with the Adobe Presets format and Adobe Print Shop preview dialogs, which opens automatically when a file is opened in Share for Review. Users can use the Share for Review button to interact with their team before saving their local changes, and will continue to see the local changes in the review session.
